12/25/13 Happy (almost) New Year! We say goodbye to 2013 by visiting some of our favorite stories of the year again. Enjoy.

Official criticism is probably the most feared and retiquen part of the art and design school, often ending in tears (or decisions just to go to the accounting place). But for her thesis project at the University of Maryland Institute College of Art, Christina Beard actually volunteered to have her graphic design work, repeatedly, criticized around her today by 23 of her most successful designers, including Maira Kalman, Stefan Sagmeister, Debbie Millman and Paula Scher. The project is featured in his new book Critiqued: Inside the Minds of 23 Leaders in Design as part of the episode moment, episode interview series and how some of today's leading design figures think. If you're going to do a simple job, over-relie it. Beard's iteration design experiment looked like a children's phone game. She began by designing a poster with a simple message: Wash Your Hands. This began as an example of blue and green hands in the formation like a tree, reaching up, with messages in simple capital letters at the bottom. With posters on the bench, designers, writers and curators sat down with a number of beard co design as they shared ways of thinking and revealed their processes. At the end of our conversation, I walked away with a good understanding of how they thought about design and how they would be about designing a simple message. And then he went a few days to live in that mindset. At each stop, the participant criticized his poster: Language and image integrated, suggested designer Ellen Lupton, his first critic. Posters are for people, so they should be human, said Paula Scher of Pentagram. Henri Bendel's designer, Deanne Cheuk, said it was very masculine. I definitely think there's a difference between designs from men and designs from women. Beard redesigned the poster according to each critic's feedback. The project continued for a year, until Beard designed 25 posters, all of them with the same message—Wash your hands—in a spectacular variety of ways. Talking to leading designers has meant that many of them have strong ideas about how I should design this simple message, says Beard. There, there is a difference between designs from men and designs from women. Some are tougher than others-Ugh. I think it's really depressing, Maira Kalman said in a iteration. It could work in prison. Then, when Beard made the poster pinker and brighter, MGMT's Sarah Gephart told him to start over. After this comment, Beard cut a big X on his image, militaristic writing? and smeared along with sarcastic comments like lipstick? MGMT advice be informative. Try to engage your audience by visualizing the information in an engaging way. Discover ways to inject narrative and humor. After this criticism, the beard poster was sequen to a pink Wash your hands into a complex black-and-white infographic about hand washing message. But he couldn't stop there: When Steven Heller saw the new poster, he said a lot of information. Like a little designer, Beard was ens enseded. There seemed to be two feedback camps, beard co design says. A number of designers literally and especially gave me a direction. Whether they sketched it or gave me references to look at it. I walked away with a clear idea of what to do. For example, Stefan Sagmeister suggested adding bathroom humor or designing the poster as a reflective mirror. If you're going to make it simple, be extreme about it, Sagmeister said. The other set of designers asked a lot of questions around context, distribution, language and audience. Instead of jumping on what the poster should look like, we had a critical conversation about the purpose of the poster. Says. It serves as a reminder never of the perfect formula of how the variety of process and opinion among leading designers, and there are no rule books. Beard's advice to those with a phobia of criticism: Be clear. Hearing other people's feedback and unique perspectives can help you develop and develop your own approach. Skip the navigation! Designers can work or boutiques, manufacturers and other fashion retailers. According to the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, fashion designers had an average annual salary of $73,000 in 2012, and most clothing was employed by wholesalers. All designers have almost the same goals and goals in their careers, no matter where they work. A fashion designer cannot sell or profit from his designs if the public is not interested in buying them. Successful designers make predicting consumer trends a primary goal in their work. Designers study current consumer trends and determine target demographics that are likely to buy their garments. For example, some designers create clothes for young girls, while others focus on business professionals. Designers use their target demographics and knowledge to determine which designs are likely to appeal to consumers in the future. Before a dress, suit or sweater can be displayed in a store, it begins as a sketch in a designer's idea book. Designers spend most of their time thinking about themes and designs for their clothing collections, and can use computer software to help them through the design process. Each designer's primary purpose is to sell clothing design, and designs can undergo multiple revisions before a designer settles into a final design. Some designers are involved in the construction of their designs and can work directly with production teams, while others can only oversee the production process and rely on other professionals to sew. A designer can't sell his clothes if the public never sees what he's created. Marketing is a big priority for fashion designers, whether they are self-employed and selling their clothes online or trying to find a job at an international fashion retailer. Aspiring designers who are just starting out in their careers spend a considerable amount of time marketing themselves and their products to get public attention. Established designers continue to market themselves through printing and online advertising. A fashion designer can't be too many friends, as he can help more every professional career that meets the fashion industry. Fashion designers make a point to create powerful, enduring connections to a variety of other fashion professionals. It contains the source that fabric manufacturers and trade fair runners, fabrics and appetizers designers need to see their designs come to life.
